V27 19 . Ultimate Coins Smeet Hack V27 19 (Photo by Andrew Burton/Getty Images) Politico reported this week that Florida Governor Rick Scott may use some of the state's "911 bonus" money to fund public works projects in other parts of the state. The bonus is meant to spur employment, which one could argue is an important quality of a public works project, but people for whom spending money on infrastructure development is a way to help other people are apparently not included in the team Scott has convened to make decisions about the state's $1.75 billion. "The governor has appointed a bipartisan work group to help him decide which projects to support with the money, and most will be public works projects that can be built quickly," reports the Orlando Sentinel. So while we're waiting for the governor's decision about public works projects, here are six things Florida may not want to spend its money on. 1. Turnpike tolls (Photo by Lynne Sladky/The Denver Post via Getty Images) The state of Florida takes its turnpike tolls from the media, as it does every state's turnpike tolls, including the Bay Bridge tolls in California. The turnpike is about the only way to get to parts of south Florida, but it's not the cheapest, cheapest way to get around. The latest toll estimate, provided by the Florida Department of Transportation, is that the average non-resident will pay $32.50 to drive on the turnpike between May and October. The average resident will pay $33.75. Drivers should hope they're not in the unique subcategory of tolls from a "new" toll. The state may want to make drivers use the interstate highway system instead: Florida has a lousy interstate system. 2. Hollywood Casino (Photo by Patrick T.
